Is the use of training aids by Choralia fully legal from a copyright viewpoint?

All files provided by Choralia are stored on servers physically located in United States of America. Copyright laws of U.S.A. apply. The works for which training aids are published on Choralia are either in the public domain in the U.S.A., or permission has been obtained from the relevant copyright holders, or they are provided under the "Fair Use" conditions as per Title 17, Chapter 1, para. 107 of the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976.

After Choralia's training aids are downloaded from our servers, users are responsible to meet the requirements of their local copyright laws and regulations. Please be aware that works that are in the public domain in the U.S.A. might not be in the public domain in other countries (e.g., in the European Union), due to different regulations. The "Fair use" doctrine as it is intended in the U.S.A. might not be recognized in other countries. A copyright warning is shown on the catalogue pages for works that are most likely subject to restrictions in other countries. Anyway, the ultimate responsibility to check and meet the requirements of local copyright laws when using Choralia's training aids is with the user.

Are Choralia's training aids copyrighted? What's the copyright policy?

The manager of Choralia, Massimo Capozza, owns all the applicable intellectual property rights of the Choralia's training aids, such as creative components added by him, electronic performance rights, broadcasting rights, etc. . Use of training aids is permitted under license. Choralia's license policy is based on the Creative Commons Attribution Non-Commercial Share Alike license policy, plus some Choralia-specific additions. Anybody who receives training aids made by Choralia is to be regarded as a Licensee, who may use the training aids under the license conditions described hereafter.

The training aids are provided for the Licensee's individual use only. However, the Licensee is allowed to copy and distribute the training aids to other people, who will automatically become Choralia's Licensees, too. The Licensee shall inform any person receiving a copy about the Choralia's license conditions described herein and about the Choralia's donation policy. Specifically, if copies of Choralia's training aids are made for other people, a donation to Choralia for each copy should be made. The donation may be made either by the person who makes the copy, or by the person who receives it. People receiving a copy of the training aids without knowing whether a donation was made or not for such a copy should consider making a donation on their own.

The Licensee who duplicates and/or distributes the Choralia's training aids must not make any profit from it. The Licensee may recover costs for materials (e.g., recordable CDs or tapes) without profit. Any copies must not be sold for profit.

The act of receiving and using any training aids made by Choralia is deemed as agreement to this license.

The license may be changed or withdrawn at any time.

The Creative Commons Attribution Non-Commercial Share Alike license policy applies for any other conditions not described above. In the case of conflict between the above license conditions and Creative Commons Attribution Non-Commercial Share Alike, the above license conditions prevail.

Can I make copies and distribute training aids to my choir or to others?

Yes, you can. However, you have to inform any person receiving a copy about the Choralia's license conditions and about the Choralia's donation policy. See details about Choralia's license policy above.

Can I make copies and sell training aids to my choir or to others?

No, you cannot. You may only recover costs for materials (e.g., recordable CDs or tapes) without profit. Any copies must not be sold for profit. See details about Choralia's license policy above.

How can I notify Choralia of a copyright infringement?

If you are a copyright holder and you believe that Choralia is infringing your intellectual property rights, please notify us via the contact information available on the top of this page. In your notification, please specify any content for which you are the copyright holder, and include the elements specified in the Digital Millenium Copyright Act of the U.S. regulations.
